Background on EPA's Affordability Metric

When EPA developed their affordability metric, the key considerations were “(a) user burden (e.g. drinking water costs increase per household), (b) existence of financial assistance from other than water users, (c) knowledge that user burden alone as a criterion could act as a barrier against technology, and (d) difficulty for a system to install a technology that did not meet the affordability criteria” (U.S. EPA Science Advisory Board 1998). The EPA did consider (1) links between increases in household costs and MHI, (2) if there should be adjustments to account for other financial assistance, (3) if groundwater and surface water and public versus private systems should have different baselines, (4) if there are any other existing methods for estimating household annual water bills, (5) if consumption volume should be considered, (6) if there are additional mechanisms for estimating MHI, (7) whether the best measure is the mean or median household income, (8) if comparisons should occur across utilities, and (9) whether the most vulnerable are the residential users (U.S. EPA Science Advisory Board 1998).

In 1998, a Science Advisory Board for the EPA commented that defining affordability by MHI was not well explained, “questioned why the economic circumstances of less fortunate families was unimportant”, and stated that there was a lack of a clear conceptual framework which makes the affordability determination appear highly arbitrary (U.S. EPA Science Advisory Board 1998). In addition to the Science Advisory Board's report in 2002 (U.S. EPA Science Advisory Board 2002), the National Drinking Water Advisory Council gave recommendations in 2003 (U.S. EPA National Drinking Water Advisory Council 2003), but these two advisory committees presented some conflicting recommendations. The EPA ended up releasing a proposal to revise the affordability criteria which included a relaxation of the 2.5% threshold to focus on economic feasibility of large public water systems (Belzer 2020; U.S. EPA 2006). This proposal was met with criticism and no revisions have been finalized (Belzer 2020).

Specific Notes on the GIS Mapping Methodology

- The shapefiles with the census tracts, incorporated areas, and cities/places for Alabama were added and projected using NAD 1983 State Plane Alabama East FIPS 0101 Feet.
- Selected polygons were used from “2016 City Limits and Places (Census Data)” shapefile for the census-designated places and a shapefile was created to estimate the area of the Poarch Creek Indian Reservation.
- The ArcToolbox Conversion tool was used to turn the Microsoft Excel files with utility rate data and household income data into tables compatible with ArcMap.
- The ArcToolbox Split tool was used to divide the sewer polygons along the boundaries of the census tracts.
- We added a new field to the attribute table for estimating the percentage of MHI spent on annual sewer and OWTS expenses. We used the ArcMap tool Calculate Geometry to populate this field with the corresponding monthly wastewater expenses multiplied by twelve, divided by the census tract’s annual MHI, and multiplied by 100. We used Symbology, a map of wastewater expenses as a percentage of annual income was generated to determine areas where households have unaffordable wastewater expenses. The data were classified into four manual breaks using intervals less than 1.00%, 1.00% to 1.99 %, 2.00 % to 2.49 %, and  $\geq 2.50\%$ .

Assigning Utility Service Areas and Rates

In Baldwin County (the second fastest growing Alabama county), no utility has exclusive right to provide sewer and water; because numerous utilities may operate in a single municipality, each municipality was assigned the rates for the municipal utility or the private utility with the largest quantity of listed customers in that municipality on their NPDES permit. In Jefferson County (the most populous Alabama county, which includes the city of Birmingham), municipalities that are partially served by Jefferson County Sewer, a municipal sewer utility and/or a private sewer utility were assigned the municipal utility's lower sewer rates.

The City of Taylor currently has a wastewater treatment plant under construction and their NPDES permit documents mention that their sewer currently goes to a neighboring city for treatment, so this municipality was assigned the rates for Dothan. Mobile County Water, Sewer, and Fire Protection Authority was assigned to census tracts in Mobile County that are not served by other sewer utilities and have population equivalent to the served population reported on UNC Dashboard. There were two census tracts removed that had zero land area (located over Mobile Bay). There was one census tract in Etowah County that was missing its geocoding value, so it was unable to be matched to income data. However, Census Tract 107 in the income data spreadsheet did not match to a geocoded value in the census tract shapefile and is also in Etowah County so it was assumed that these two should be matched.

Estimating Number of Households in each Sewered Polygon

Under certain circumstances, there were specific deviations utilized to accurately distribute households to polygons including (1) assigning the quantity of households based on the census tract area for census tracts with roughly 1,000 households, (2) using the estimated number of households based on the polygon's percentage of municipality area for utilities with fewer than six polygons or fewer than 2,000 households, (3) assigning entire census tract populations to polygons that were >85% of the census tract area, (4) assigning the polygons' household quantities based solely on their percentage of the census tract area for census tracts that had more than one municipality, and (5) assigning polygons' entire census tract populations when necessary for large municipalities to reflect the utility's estimated service populations. If there were any unassigned households serviced by a utility, then they were distributed among the polygons for that municipality.

Results for Supplemental Figures

When analyzing wastewater affordability with OWTS represented as lump sum of capital costs (Figure S2), conventional systems are only affordable for households with median incomes greater than or equal to $200,000 and mound systems are only affordable for households with median incomes greater than or equal to $800,000. Therefore, there are no census tracts where OWTS would be affordable as a lump sum based on the MHI. There are six census tracts where households use OWTS, but the MHI is less than the capital cost of OWTS (See Table S4). These are all located in Black Belt counties (Montgomery, Dallas, Perry, and Wilcox). There are 73 census tracts with households outside of sewer service areas where the capital cost of OWTS is greater than 50% of the annual MHI (See Table S4).

When analyzing wastewater affordability with OWTS represented as the average annual cost to pump the tank every five years (Figure S3), the only areas with census tracts wastewater costs exceeding 2.5% of MHI are those serviced by sewer utilities. The situation illustrated in Figure S3 reflects a case in which the capital costs of OWTS are completely subsidized (e.g., by a grant). While no existing federal program will pay up to the $20,000 in capital costs required for advanced OWTS, the possible effects of some existing federal and state programs are discussed in the Discussion.

When analyzing wastewater affordability with OWTS represented as lump sum of capital costs (Figure S4, Table 2), as previously mentioned, conventional systems would only be considered affordable for households with annual incomes greater than or equal to $200,000 and mound systems are only affordable for households with annual incomes greater than or equal to $800,000. Across Alabama, there are estimated to be 644,234 households with unaffordable access to OWTS when paying for the systems as a lump sum of capital costs. Of these households, 89.5% (576,830 households) are assumed to need a conventional system and 10.5% (67,404 households) are assumed to need a mound system (See Table 2).

Impacts of COVID-19 Pandemic on the Affordability of Wastewater Access:

Due to the use of data primarily from 2019, the COVID-19 pandemic's effects on wastewater rates were excluded from the primary discussion. However, possible effects of the COVID-19 pandemic on wastewater utilities should be considered in future affordability studies. The economic impacts of the COVID-19 pandemic will continue to exacerbate affordability challenges. In a report published by the AWWA discussing the financial impact the pandemic had on water utilities, they point out that many things that impact water utilities will also impact sewer utilities. The delayed collection of delinquent accounts, loss of non-residential customers, stopping service shut-offs, and changing operational policies will also greatly impact wastewater utilities in the years to come (AWWA and Association of Metropolitan Water Agencies 2020). After discussing the reports' findings, AWWA suggested there may be a combined impact on current and future revenue for water and wastewater utilities totaling up to $15.5 billion (AWWA and Association of Metropolitan Water Agencies 2020). Depending on how utilities aim to earn back the revenue lost during the COVID-19 pandemic, there could be many water and wastewater rate increases implemented as the pandemic recedes.
